Section 096 ¿ Water Treatment Technologies and Water Quality Assessment Techniques. Students will be introduced to an array of modern analytical instrumentation with the goal of providing them with the tools with which they can further their applied research in environmental monitoring with a focus on water quality. This course has been designed to remove the veil of intimidation associated with much of the modern instrumentation, analytical, and aquatic chemistry. Students from a variety of backgrounds should ultimately gain a knowledge of what instrumentation is out there, what it can do, and how it can be used. To put these monitoring approaches in context, various aspects of water treatment will also be explored. If a student becomes a consultant, this experience can be used to direct specific research to the appropriate resources or if working for a human health agency will understand how to critique data and challenge tits quality and source. Having learned how to generate and interpret reliable data, the consultant or environmental health specialist will be in a strong position to determine the validity of data he/she handles.

SPHG 428H.001 | Public Health Entrepreneurship
M, 4:40 pm - 7:40 pm. Instructor(s): Alice Ammerman. Enrollment = 20.
The innovative and sustainable nature of entrepreneurial pursuit can benefit public health initiatives, especially when entrepreneurship identifies economically self-sustaining solutions to public health challenges. This three-credit course will introduce students to basic concepts and case studies of commercial and social entrepreneurship as applied to the pursuit of public health through both for-profit and non-profit entities. This course features many guest speakers with successful experience in public health entrepreneurship in diverse arenas.

At the core of this course is a real-world project where students will work in groups to design their own start-ups, refining both their idea throughout the semester and pitching it to experienced entrepreneurs for feedback.
